Symmes's Hole. LECTURE OF AMERICUS SYMMES ON THE POLAR REGIONS AND CONCERNING A LAND ON THE IN-SIDE OF THE EARTH, WHICH IS FILLED WITH GAY BIRDS AND RICH VEGETATION.

Mr. Americus Symmes delivered a lecture before the Male High-School to-day at noon on the arctic regions, devoted especially to reviving the theory of his father, the late Captain John C. Symmes, of the United States army, concerning polar voids and concentric spheres.

The lecturer began by saying that he had undertaken the task as a filial duty; and speaking of his father and his theory, he said in substance:

For the last ten years of his life he never devoted thirty consecutive days to business, but dedicated all his time, energy, and strength to the study of philosophy; and he worked out a theory of his own in relation to the formation of our earth, which be called "Symmes's Theory of Concentric Spheres and Polar Voids"-this theory being that the earth is hollow and babitable within. The climate there, be contended, was open and genial, and the whole country abounded in life of almost every kind, all of which has been proven true to the letter, as far as explorations in the North have been made, city savings..... since his day, he having died in May, 1829.

petitioned Congress for aid; but his petition was politely laid on the table. He made an effort, in a lecturing tour, to fit out the expedition by private subscriptions, but else failed in this Trial and the expedition of the property of the property of the petition of failed in this. His health also failed, and be was brought home to die, deeply impressed to the last with the idea that there was an open Polar Ses, and that the earth was hollow, and habitable within, which he arrived at by "putting this and that together"-by putting the idea of a hollow earth alongside of the known phenomena of nature, terrestrial and celestial. To the very last he held to his theory, and contended that there was a new world beyond the Arctic and Antarctic lines awaiting a new Columbus-a new Inferno that Dante had not visited within this outer shell of earth.

Captain Symmes was conversant with Sir Isanc Newton's theory of the law of gravity. Newton was undefined in one point. He never thoroughly understood magnetism. This was always a riddle and bother to him. The earth is a magnet, or has a magnet in it. How was the magnet made? Analogy-not always right, to be sure, but more often right than wrong-would lead us to believe that any section of the earth perpendicular to its axis-to the magnet, say, within it-that section, for instance, made by the plane of the Arctic or Antarctic circle, like that made by a stiff paper, on which, if you place iron filings they will gradually arrange themselves into concentric spheres if a bar magnet be held over the filings, and the paper be tapped-would give concentric circles. From this theory of the magnet sprang my father's

My father was not a mere theorist, but will relate his theory, which is as follows: According to his theory the earth is globular and widely open at the poles. The diameter of the northern opening is about 2 000 miles; the southern opening is somewhat larger. The planes of these openings are parallel to each other, but form an apgle of 12 degrees with the equator, so that the highest part of the north plane is directly or posite the lowest part of the south plane. The shell of the earth is about 1,000 miles toick, and the edges of this shell at the opening are called verges, and measure in the regular concavity within to the regular concavity without about 500 miles.

25c. Flaxseed: $1.70@$1.75 \text{ bushel.}

Flaxseed: $1.70@$1.75 \text{ bushel.} regular concavity without about 500 miles The verges occupy about 25 degrees, and, n delineated on a map, would show only the outer half of the verge, while all above or tarther from the equator, both north and south, would lie on the apex and within the verge. All the polar regions upon the present map would be out of sight. The meridian lines extend at right angles from the equator to the outer edges of the verges, and then wind round along the surface of the verges, terminating at the points directly under the highest parts of the verges, both north and south. From the regular convexmy of the interior concavity of the earth across the verge is 1,500 miles-a distance so great that a vessel sailing over the verge would not perceive the change in her direction except from the apparent change of the heaven's bodies or from observations of the difference in the expanse of the visible

The ship going north along the deflected meridians upon and over the verge causes the apparent charge in the North star that Captain Perry mentions, for he says, when sailing northward in high latitude the North star rises over the bow of the ship to the zenith, and then declines toward the stern. On the Newtonian theory the ship must have tabled directly under the star and over and 12c. : Hallowell, 11c. down upon the opposte side of the earth. But this can not be true, for no navigator has sailed so far north. But the vessel must have been sailing over the verge and inte the earth, which must necessarily bring the North star over the stern of the vessel. Captain Ross, another experienced navigator in the north, when in high taitudes beyond the verge, speaks of the Arctic Sea as being calm and clear of ice, while south of him was a wide beit of ice. He describes the currents of air coming from the north as being so warm as to dissolve the snow and ice around him and far to the south. Captain Perry makes frequent mention of these warm currents of air coming from the north and east-that is, from which produced this change of climate in the Arctic regions—heretofore supposed to be one vast solitude of eternal ice—may not be fully known. The progress of science and the discoveries of explorers will soon shed more light on this interesting subject. All explorers agree that 68 and 70 degrees north latitude is the support of the s degrees north latitude is the summit of the verge, and the farther you go north from that point the warmer it gets, for at 80 and up to 82 degrees Captain Hall found it much warmer, and got into a region of country full of life. Driftwood is found in great quantities on the north side of Iceland, Norway, and Spitzbergen, while none is found on the south side. Trees of large Trees of large size and of different kinds, such as were supposed to be walnut and ash, are found, some in good preservation. Vegetables of singular character, and flowers of peculiar fraguance and color, unknown to botanists, are sometimes found in this drift. This interior world would be lighted by the converging of the rays of the sun refracted and reflected.

Immense shoals of herring, in good order and condition, according to Buffon, come down from the Polar seas, and are never known to return. If they return in the spring, why are they never observed as well as when they go south? Admit the Symmes theory, and the conjecture would not be unreasonable that they make the annual circuit of the earth over the exterior and interior surfaces, and through both openings at the poles.

All these facts being fully established by incontestible proofs, the conclusion is legiti-

All these facts being fully established by incontestible proofs, the conclusion is legitimate that far to the north of the frozen regions of the verge there exists a milder climate and an open sea, whose existence has never been fully explained, and is inconsistent with the Newtonian theory of the earth.
